A Little Bit of Water

In our parashah, Avraham Avinu says to the malachim (18:4), "Please let some water be brought and wash your feet, and recline under the tree."

Let's ask some questions:

1. It states in Masechet Bava Metzia (86b), "Said R' Yehudah in the name of Rav: Everything that Avraham did by himself, Hashem did by Himself. And what he [-Avraham] did through a messenger, [-Hashem] gave to them through a messenger. Therefore since the intention of "Please let some water be brought" was through a messenger, so too, did the Jewish Nation merit water through Moshe, who hit the rock. On the other hand, when the pasuk states, "And he stood," or "to the cattle ran Avraham," so too, did Hashem Himself give their reward by establishing clouds of glory and bringing them down the quail." This is seemingly difficult: Avraham offered the malachim only a small amount of water – why was the reward of the Jewish people not diminished in size as well? Why did they receive an abundance of water; they apparently should have only received a small amount as well?
2. I furthermore saw quoted from the Nachal Eliyahu, who asks why Avraham only gave them a small amount of water. Why did he not give them a large amount like they needed?

3. The question is magnified when we consider the fact that Avraham slaughtered three calves to serve his guests three tongues. He spared no expense to honor them when it came to the meat. Yet when it came to the water, he only gave them a small amount. What is the explanation for this?

Do It Right

We will begin by saying that there are many individuals who err in their path of Divine service. They think that to be particular, scrupulous, and stringent regarding the fulfillment of mitzvot is the most important part of Judaism. Yet they do not examine, clarify, and think whether their stringencies are adversely affecting their surroundings, family members, and employees. Since they consider stringent adherence to the mitzvot to be supremely important, many times they damage or disturb their fellow men with their actions. Yet they think that their fellow men are also bound to their way of thinking, and they therefore do not have to consider their fellow men. On the contrary – their fellow men must be considerate of them.

This is a great mistake in avodat Hashem, for the ends do not justify the means. Quite the opposite, this is a mitzvah ha'ba me'aveirah, a mitzvah that is performed by committing a sin. Our Sages have stated that "Derech erez kadmah leTorah, Refined conduct precedes the Torah." Therefore, prior to fulfilling the Torah and mitzvot, one must contemplate whether his action is not at the expense of the mitzvot between man and his fellow.

The only path for fulfilling Torah and mitzvot is one that is free of any trace of transgressing the mitzvot between man and his fellow. Only then is it possible to fulfill the Torah and mitzvot. For if the means towards performing Torah and mitzvot are not proper and in line with the Torah perspective, it is a mitzvah performed by committing a sin, and the reward for such a mitzvah is lost.

Now we can answer the questions posed above: It's true that Avraham was willing to provide his guests with everything in great measure. However, that is only when the service was being performed by him. However, here a messenger was bringing the water. He therefore could not demand him to exert much effort, for it would constitute going beyond the letter of the law at the expense of his fellow man.

Two types of Hachnosat Orchim

We see in our parashah two different instances of hachnosat orchim, one of Avraham and that of Lot. Avraham certainly exerted great effort to tend to the needs of his guests. But Lot did something which Avraham would never do. When the townspeople of Sodom surrounded Lot's house, demanding that he send out the guests so that they may get to "know" them better, Lot sought to protect his guests by offering his daughters instead. Lot said to the rabble-rousers, "I have two daughters, unbeknownst to men; I will send them out to you; do with them whatever you want; just do not do anything to my guests who have come to take refuge in my house."

Ramban points out that Lot's protectiveness of his guests did not justify the injustice he was prepared to do to his daughters. The fact that Lot was willing to satisfy their immoral desires by giving them his daughters shows that this type of indecency was not so repulsive in Lot's eyes. It seems that from Lot's perspective, he was not doing anything too terrible to his girls. Our Sages say that most decent people go all out to protect their wives and daughters from this type of abuse; whereas Lot was willing, of his own accord, to hand over his daughters.

So Hakadosh Baruch Hu told Lot, "Your daughters will be saved for you."

Wives are People, Too

There is a lesson here to be learned. Sometimes a person gets so caught up with doing a mitzvah, that he loses sight of other people's feelings and rights.

We look at Lot and fail to understand how he could suggest something so atrocious, so downright rotten and distasteful. Yet, sometimes we ourselves are guilty of similar miscalculations, albeit not to the same proportions. Perhaps we feel inspired to improve our mitzvah performance, in one area or another. We must always take into account how it will affect those around us, particularly close family members and spouses. Certainly the basic mitzvah must be done without compromise. We are speaking here about the extras, the above and beyond. Such acts of piety cannot be done at the expense of the needs of others.

You want to take on a chumra, a chizuk? Discuss it first with your wife. See if it makes sense. You'll only gain.

The Heavy Pail

We will relate stories about Gedolei Yisrael that illustrate just how much they were stringent when it came to mitzvot regarding man and his fellow. This was even the case when it came at the expense of being scrupulous with a mitzvah that they were performing. Such was the case with R' Yisrael Salanter as well.

One time when R' Yisrael was living in Kovno, he was seen washing his hands before the meal with a small amount of water – even though there was a pail full of water standing before him. When they sat down to eat, R' Yisrael was asked why he sufficed with such a small amount of water for netilat yadaim. For our Sages state in Masechet Shabbat (62b) that R' Chisda attributed his abundant blessings to the fact that he washed his hands with a large amount of water.

R' Yisrael answered that he saw the housekeeper bring the water from a far distance and that she was practically collapsing beneath the heavy weight of the water. He remarked that it is forbidden for an individual to exceed the letter of law if it is at the expense of someone else's shoulders.

Quick Meal

R' Yisrael Salanter had a disciple who constantly requested that R' Yisrael be his guest for Shabbat. Yet R' Yisrael always refused. The disciple described to his rebbe the way he conducted himself at the Shabbat table. He would recite prayers, sing songs of praise, and speak words of Torah. Everything was carried out with the greatest level of exactitude, and the mitzvah was beautified to the greatest extent. Why, then, did R' Yisrael refuse to be his guest?

Finally, R' Yisrael acquiesced, but he made a condition with his student, stipulating that he would head the Shabbat table. Understandably, the student happily agreed. When they returned from the beit haknesset, R' Yisrael requested to immediately make kiddush and skip over all of the Shabbat liturgy that preceded it. His student was incredulous, but he could not protest his rebbe's decision. They then washed their hands and immediately ate. R' Yisrael ate quickly and immediately requested the second course and dessert. Then he asked for mayim achronim and recited bircat hamazon. Understandably, the student was surprised – is this the way the Shabbat meal is supposed to be? No prayers, zemirot, or words of Torah?

However, R' Yisrael, instead of explaining himself, called in the housekeeper, who came to the table. He asked her forgiveness for causing her any inconvenience by rushing the meal. After all, she had no time to pause and was constantly serving and clearing off the table. However, she thanked the rav for the very great kindness that he had performed for her that Shabbat. She wished it could be like that every Shabbat. She explained that she was a widow and desperately needed a livelihood, to the extent that she was forced to work on Shabbat. Each Shabbat, the meal took a very long time, ending close to midnight. Only after they would finish, could she return home to make kiddush for her children. Since at that time it was already very late, the children would doze off, lacking any desire to eat the Shabbat meal. Sometimes she even had to eat alone. Each Shabbat she suffered anew. However, baruch Hashem, this Shabbat, since they finished early, she could joyously eat together with her children, as is befitting a Shabbat meal.

"Now you understand why I hurried the meal," explained R' Yisrael. "It is a mitzvah performed by committing a transgression to be exceedingly scrupulous, and recite lengthy tefillot and zemirot at the expense of others. On the contrary, the greatest beautification of a mitzvah is when an individual beautifies mitzvot bein adam le'chavero. Then he can afterwards be exceedingly scrupulous with prayers, song, and divrei Torah. This we learn from the incident with Avraham Avinu. Even though he gave everything else in great abundance, when it came to water, he gave only a little. Since it was brought by his servant, he only gave the amount that was absolutely necessary, and he would not go beyond the letter of the law at someone else's expense. How careful must an individual be not to burden his friend. Many times it is the exact opposite; with himself he is willing to forgo acting scrupulously, but when someone else is involved, then he has demands and specifications. However, the path of the Torah is not so; rather, he must consider his friend and honor him. On the contrary, his own honor he can forgo, but not the honor of his friend."

A Hidur in Matzah Baking

It is furthermore told about the custom of R' Yisrael Salanter, who was part of a special matzah baking group. They baked the matzot with all of the stringencies possible. R' Yisrael personally stood by and watched to make sure that everything was being done in the most perfect way possible.

One time, he took ill, and was unable to participate. The members of the group approached him to receive guidance on how to bake the matzot. He responded by saying that the main thing, the most important stringency, is to be very careful with the honor of the woman who kneaded the matzot. They should not scream at her, nor distress or cause pain in any way, for she is an unfortunate widow.

The Give-in Kaddish

Here's another good one, a mitzvah to publicize: Rabbi Yisrael Salanter once came to shul on his father's yahrzeit. Understandably, he wished to daven for the amud, as is the standard custom. Now, a man was present who also wanted the amud, because he had yahrzeit for his daughter. The rule is that yahrzeit for a father has precedence. Nonetheless, Reb Yisrael insisted that the other man be chazzan. Upon being asked how he could so easily give up on the merit to his father's soul, he responded, that the merit of giving in to the other person is worth a hundred kadeishim.

Time for Maariv

In Reb Yisrael Salanter's shul, there was an interesting custom. Maariv services were held before the proper time for recital of Shema. Why? Explained Reb Yisrael: Many of the mispallellim have people at home who worked long and hard on Erev Shabbat. They are tired and hungry. We cannot postpone their seudah. We must allow the men to return home in a timely fashion to recite kiddush and begin the seudah. Kriat Shema can be repeated later on, after nightfall.

Getting Up for Selihot

Here is yet another example of Reb Yisrael's sensitivity.

Soon before Rosh Hashanah and again during Aseret Yemei Teshuvah, Ashkenazim rise early to recite Selihot. (Sefardim do so already from the beginning of Ellul.) Although the optimal time for Selihot is just before daybreak, Reb Yisrael would make it clear that no one is to get up early at the expense of the sleep of other household members. Better to forego the Selihot than to cause another Jew pain.

How Much Water?

We told a few stories about Reb Yisrael Salanter. Now let us turn to the Chofetz Chaim.

The Chofetz Chaim once attended a wedding of one of his talmidim. Upon his arrival, the Chofetz Chaim went to the kitchen to clarify something. When it came time for the seudah, the Chofetz Chaim washed only until his knuckles, as we do on Yom Kippur. His talmidim asked for an explanation. The Chofetz Chaim told them that he had found out in the kitchen that the water here is shlepped by an orphaness. Therefore I used the bare minimum.

Kiddush First

On a different occasion, Reb Leib Chasman ate the Shabbos Seudah at the home of the Chofetz Chaim. As soon as they came back from Maariv, the Chofetz Chaim made Kiddush immediately and only after the first course did he sing 'Shalom Aleichem.' He explained himself, "The Malachim can wait. But when I have guests, I never know how hungry they may be, so I make Kiddush right away."

This is consistent with what the Chofetz Chaim writes in his Mishna Berura on Hilchot Sukkah. Shulchan Aruch rules that when it rains on Sukkot, one eats indoors. Rema qualifies that on the first night of Sukkot, one eats in the Sukkah even if it is raining. Being that it is questionable if a Brachah can be said upon the Sukkah under such circumstances, Mishna Berura rules that a person ought to wait until close to midnight for the rain to stop. But he is quick to add that if he is very hungry or thirsty or his family members will be inconvenienced, and certainly if he has guests, he should forego all the stringencies and make Kiddush right away.

A Shorter Prayer

There was a period of time that the Chafetz Chayim resided in the city Moloditza. He prayed in the large beit haknesset there, together with the rav of the city. Despite the fact that it was the Chafetz Chayim's custom to regularly lengthen his prayers, during that period, however, he shortened them. He always tried to finish his prayers before the rav. He did not want the congregation to wait for him, but rather for the rav. He wanted to prevent the rav from feeling bad.

No Great Shakes

When the Chafetz Chayim lived in the city of Snovask in the period of the First World War, there was a terrible shortage of lulavim and etrogim. With great difficulty, they managed to obtain one lulav and etrog, and they brought it to the Chafetz Chayim. Even though the Chafetz Chayim held the four species to fulfill the mitzvah, he absolutely refused to take them to shake during Hallel.

When they asked him why he did so, he answered that while the entire congregation could also fulfill their requirement to make a blessing over the species, only he would be able to shake them for Hallel. By doing so, this would cause anguish to the other members of the congregation. It was therefore better to forgo shaking the lulav, for that is only a custom, even though it is an ancient and holy custom. But being careful not to cause others pain involves several positive and negative Torah commandments.

Live By It

We have now learned the proper path of Torah and mitzvot, and that the ends do not justify the means. On the contrary, if there is even the slightest harm caused to one's fellow due to his fulfillment of the Torah and mitzvot, it is preferable to forgo the mitzvah, because it is being performed through a transgression. Therefore, man is required to contemplate before doing each mitzvah if he is causing any harm to his surroundings. Only when he has taken everything into consideration and verified that his actions are free of violating the mitzvot between man and his fellow, can he fulfill the Torah and mitzvot.

As stated, this is particularly relevant in the realm of Shalom Bayit. Every degree of concern for one's spouse's needs and feelings is inviting the Shechinah into one's home.

Shabbat Shalom
Rav Mordechai Malka
